Responding to Abuse with Care and Expertise

Domestic Abuse Isn't Always Visible — Experts Warn of 'Silent Control' Local support organisations are urging communities to recognise the less visible forms of domestic abuse, following a recent case that revealed how easily coercive control can go unnoticed.

While physical violence often draws immediate attention, many victims experience abuse through financial restriction, isolation, and emotional manipulation. In one recent case, a woman reported being unable to access food, finances, or freedom of movement.
Communication with support workers was limited, suggesting she may not have felt safe to speak openly.
Experts explain that this type of control — often referred to as coercive control — can be just as damaging as physical violence.

"It's about power," said a local support worker. "When someone controls your ability to eat, move, communicate, or make decisions, that is abuse."

The case also highlighted how victims may avoid formal systems such as police or social services due to fear of escalation or retaliation. Instead, support was provided through low-pressure communication, allowing the individual to engage at her own pace. Over time, the woman regained stability and reported a positive legal outcome. Support organisations say the case is not unique. "These situations are happening more often than people realise," a spokesperson said. "And they don't always look like what people expect."

Residents are encouraged to:

Recognise signs of control beyond physical harm Offer support without pressure Share

Bahia Formosa School
This week, our Grade 3 learners enjoyed an exciting and educational outing to Pick n Pay at The Market Square, Plettenberg Bay, where they were given a behind-the-scenes look at how the butchery and bakery departments operate! 📷👀 Michelle, the store manager, welcomed us warmly and led a fascinating, hands-on tour. Learners discovered how fresh bread and baked goods are prepared daily, and how the butchery team works carefully to prepare and present their products. It was a wonderful real-world learning experience that brought classroom discussions to life. To make the visit even sweeter, the learners were treated to a delicious donut at the end of the tour! 😊❤️
A heartfelt thank you to Michelle and the team at Pick 'n' Pay for their generosity, time, and enthusiasm in making this outing such a memorable one for our Grade 3s
